Twitter Didn’t Ban Child Porn, On Purpose

Twitter is now being sued for refusing to take down child porn. No seriously, but apparently defending White people is too harsh.

> Twitter refused to take down widely shared pornographic images and videos of a teenage sex trafficking victim because an investigation “didn’t find a violation” of the company’s “policies,” a scathing lawsuit alleges. The federal suit, filed Wednesday by the victim and his mother in the Northern District of California, alleges Twitter made money off the clips, which showed a 13-year-old engaged in sex acts and are a form of child sexual abuse material, or child porn, the suit states. The videos would be reported to Twitter at least three times — first on Dec. 25, 2019 — but the tech giant failed to do anything about it until a federal law enforcement officer got involved, the suit states.

This reminds me of Nicholas Kristof, a writer at the New York Times who did a profile of child sex abuse victims whose videos were posted on PornHub and never taken down. He recommended several courses of action, which PornHub immediately complied with, going even further. And Kristoff is a leftist, a Bernie supporter, whose newspaper is read mostly by Democrats. One NYT article got the largest porn site to act more than decades of the right whining about the culture war. This is a perfect example of proper censorship: child porn that is flagged and reported as such to the police. But I guess Jack Dorsey only cares the law when it involves his political opponents. Twitter needs to be taken from the private market and made into a public utility that can’t censor without a court order.
